RESEARCH/SCHOLARSHIP

Research in Progress

Old neighbor, new neighbor: Will mood after exposure to COVID-19 news be improved by one-on-one meeting and vicarious interaction with a likeable television character? by Mu Hu & Brian Brantley. This paper (which had previously been rejected for presentation at the 2023 International Communication Association annual conference) was revised and resubmitted in November for the 2024 annual conference.

Will parasocial interaction and vicarious interaction with a likable television character improve mood? Being prepared for submission to the International Association for Media and Communication Research 2024 annual conference.

Upcoming Research Projects

A continuation of the basic idea that motivated my dissertation, but switching from baseball to football and focusing specifically on representation of quarterbacks (perhaps the last and/or most persistent racial frontier in sports); I will complete separate projects for professional football and for college football (currently gathering material for literature review)

An update of my dissertation using data from either 2013 or 2023 to measure how and whether minority representation in baseball journalism has changed since my initial investigation (which used data from 2003)

Another content analysis of football journalism, except looking at portrayals of coaches rather than players; this project will be grounded in social learning theory, in that portrayal of coaches plays a part in the way that children (or at least children who watch sports) learn about how to treat and/or react to authority figures

I would like to explore further the link between parasocial contact and loneliness; specifically, I'd like to investigate the effect of the development of parasocial relationships on the emerging of loneliness in American adult males (I'd also like to examine loneliness as a dependent variable rather than an independent variable, as it's usually examined)

Peer-Reviewed Publications
